French

said they had experienced fairs back home, but the Johnson County's fair was on a much smaller scale than what they were used to seeing.

"It's like the (State) Fair in Des Moines (in France)," McFerren said.

She also said some of the cows at the fair were bigger than in France. All this talk about animals led Coultoux to ask if there was a problem here with Mad Cow disease, which appeared in some cows overseas, mainly in Great Britain. The United States does not import British beef.

The students' hour at the Johnson County 4-H and FFA Fair was part of a two-week visit to the U.S., most of which they spent in the Iowa City area. For many of them, this was their first time in the United States.

The students said what they learned about the U.S. from French television wasn't what necessarily what they experienced on their trip.

"It's different than Paris because what we see on television (are) big cities," said Juliette Joachim, 15, said. "We didn't see nice pictures of Iowa."

The students discussed among themselves, sometimes in English but mostly in French, what they had learned about their American experience.

When they flew from the East Coast to the Midwest at the beginning of their trip, adjusting to different American dialects was difficult for some.

"At the beginning of the travel, we couldn't understand some people," said Juliette Joachim, 15. Coultoux said she would be excited to come back a second time to Iowa City.

The next stop for the group: Chicago, where they are spending the last two days of their trip. They stayed with host families with students from South East Junior High School in Iowa City and Northwest Junior High School in Coralville.
